While on my home, I stopped a week at Rutherfordton, small village in North Carolina, to try the effect of some Chairbeate water in that place. There were reveral of the village, physicians in the store, and one of them seemed to take some interest in my had been a dyspeptic, and had been greatly bensfitted by the use of "Dr. Hoofland's German Bitters," prepared by yeu, and be maisted that I would try the Bitters ... He also called the next day at my room, and insisted so much that I would try them that I asked him to get me one bottle. He did it, and I commenced taking it as directed, and I do say I was more benefitted by it than all the water and medicine I had ever taken.

After reaching home one of my neighbors came to me for a prescription and medicine, (see a dyspepwhich effected much good in his case. DEATH OF THE CZIR.

The great event of the death of the Czar may change the face of Europe. In place of speculation on what may be the consequences of this occurrence, we give attached to the principles of the Constia brief sketch of his life.

Nicholas was born July 6, 1796, and is the third son of the Emperor Paul; the two elder brothers being Alexander, who became the Czar, and Constantine. Paul had snother son, Michael. Their mother was of the royal house of Wurtemburg, and was a sensible and virtuous German housewife.

Nicholas was not in his earlier years destined for the imperial throne; and his a citizen of the United States. The only education and that of Michael was directed by his mother. Among his tutors were the philologist Adelung, the political economist Storch, and in military affairs, General Landsdorf. Nicholas devoted himself with ardor to the militar ry science, and acquired no little skill in music. His preference, however, in the war days of his youth, was in the bear true faith and allegiance to the most of his time to it.

At the conclusion of the great peace of 1815, he travelled into foreign countries and visited England. Returning to Russia, he married, July 13, 1817, Charlotte, eldest daughter of Frederick William of Prussia, and is the brother-inlaw of the present king. This lady embraced the Greek religion and took the name of Alexandra Feodorowna She has not enjoyed good health, and when confined to her chamber, the emperor, who was devoted to her, always attended her, watched by her bedside and gave her her medicine. At this time Alexander was laboring under great hypocondria; and citizen can be President or Vice Presithis pact was kept a profound secret Nicholas, until 1825, assiduously prepared himself for his inheritance. He visited all the Russian provinces, and resided some years in their chief cities.

Alexander, in the year 1825, spent much time in traveling. In the autumn

he was in the Crimea, leaving Sebastopol the 10th of November, and with the empress, stopped at Taranroy, exceedingly ill. On the 1st of December he died while prayers were being offered in the convent church at St. Petersburg, and the principal nobility were assembled and the event was announced, the grand duke Nicholas summoned the guard of the palace and took the oath of allegiance to Constantine, when the guard took the same oath, and the other time Constantine was in Warsaw.

The Senate soon announced that in October, 1823, a sealed packet had been deposited with them, with injunctions to open it in case of the death of Alexander. before they proceeded to any other act. They now obeyed this command. It contained a letter of Constantine, dated January 14, 1822, renouncing the succession, and a manifesto of Alexander, dated August 16, 1823, ratifying Constantine's deed of renunciation. Nicholas, however, refused to act upon these instruments, but directed the Senate to take the oath of allegiance to his brother. Meantime Constantine, who first received the news of the death of his father, renewed by letters his own abdication, and sent them by his brother Michael, and December 26 Nicholas mounted the throne. Oaths of fidelity were taken by all the officials and most of the regi-

It was announced, however, that one regiment had quitted its barracks and proclaimed Constantine. The military governor went to them and was shot. Nicholas also appeared before them without arms, addressed them, but was not successful; and as evening approached, he ordered the insurgents to be attacked by the troops, and they were soon dispersed. On this occasion he gave great proofs of calmness, personal courage, and presence of mind.

This attempt was the work of a band of men who had long resolved to strike a blow for constitutional liberty; and on this occasion capital punishment, which for a century had been banished from Russia, was revived in the execution of the revolutionist.

We have not the space to follow Nicholas from his accession as a emperor. An tried, the emperor, behind a screen, patiently heard all the evidence; and the reasons there given for the attempt, was a love of constitutional liberty. Nicholas ever cordially hated this form of government. A government deriving its sanction from the people, like that of the United States, he was accustomed to eulogise; but a form like the British monarchy he was in the habit of traducing. He professed his aim towards his country was to conquer its poverty and its barbarism, and to improve the condition of the Russian. Since his accession, Nicholas has resided constantly in his dominions, but in 1844 he visited Queen Victoria, and in 1846, the Pope. ## BENEFITS OF ADVERTISING.

The following from the New Bedford Standard is worth the trouble of reading by all business men:

"Almost every day, we have practical demonstrations presented to our notice of the benefits of advertising. We have a little instance in our mind now which we will relate. A short time since, a patron left an advertisement of a farm which he had for sale, for insertion in the Standard. He also ordered some bills of the sale for the purpose of posting in public places. The advertisement appeared in the afternoon's paper, and before the bills were ready for delivery at our office, a purchaser had been found for officials followed their example. At this the property by means of the paper, and the farm had been sold. This is only one among the hundreds of instances of the benefits of advertising that fall under our notice. Advertising is in fact the motive power of all business. No man can secure the public trade without first informing the public what goods he can offer them, and what his system of doing business is. A man might as well attempt, Dame Partington like, to wipe up the ocean with a mop, as to try to do business without employing the public press. Papers that have the largest class of readers, should be selected as the medium of communication with the public. A paper that everybody reads, is certrinly preferable to one that has but a limited circulation and is seen in but very few houses, shops or places of public resort.

Our business community generally advertise very liberally. They seem to be fully advised of the rich returns which judicious advertising make, and manifest a determination to improve every facility. that offers to increase heir trade. There are a few sluggish, old fogies, "slow coaches" in every community who appear to be unmindful of the power of the press as applied to the trade; but the sad falling off in their business, the daily accumulations of dust and cobwebs upon their wares, are teaching them impressive lessons of a screw being loose somewhere in their business machinery. Trade will not seek out the merchant. He must solicit it, and by frequent communications with the public through the press, direct it to his doors. A man starts in business. How are the public to know that he is even in business without he informs them of the fact? How are they to know what he has to sell, or that he wants to sell anything, unless he event attended it is worth remembering. tells them of it? The grand secret of When the chiefs of the insurrection were successful trade lies in one word, and it is to ADVERTISE.
